Local businesses feel the summer slump

◆ Students leaving for the summer take their money with them, and Hillsborough Street establishments suffer.

Josianne Lauber
Staff Reporter

Although Hillsborough Street seems to be one of the busiest streets around Raleigh, the summer traffic is unbelievably slow — not only car traffic, but people traffic as well. During the regular spring and fall semesters, one can't walk down Hillsborough Street without accidentally bumping into someone. Walking down Hillsborough Street on a weekday afternoon during the summer is a whole different story.

During the summer, Hillsborough Street is practically empty except a few roaming college kids and some faculty members from campus. The summer slump has affected many businesses along the major campus street.

One business that has been feeling the summer slump is the Cream and Bean ice cream shop across from the Belltower.

"Business is bad and the tips are worse during the summer," said assistant manager Chris Ashli.

Eric Krouse, a worker at the same ice cream shop, admits business is slower in the summer but can't complain about business on the weekends.

"Weekends in the summer bring in about as much business as the weekends during the year," said Krouse.

Although Global Village café has been affected by the slow summer, Jared Gartner, a junior in Chemistry and also the manager at Global Village, feels that business is not really all that bad.

With the economy already taking a toll on local merchants, those on Hillsborough Street feel the crunch even more during the summer because of a decreased student population.

"There has been a minor increase in business, about 5-10 percent, due to an increase in name recognition and product diversity," said Gartner.

He admits, however, that business during the regular spring/fall semester is always better due to the availability of more people.

Katie Hild, a senior in business management and also a manager at Global Village, joked, "Well, we sell a lot more ice cream during the summer."

Starbucks, also a booming business during the year, has felt the decline in business. Morgan McLamb, manager of Starbucks, said the business slows down by 25 percent in the summer compared to the regular school year.

"There's not much you can do because we depend on the availability of people, and in the summer, we experience a drop."

Starbucks is going on its sixth year of business. When comparing this summer to its previous summers in business, McLamb said, "It's going fine, if not a little better than the rest."

McLamb feels if more businesses fill in the empty store fronts, then Hillsborough Street will not only be more attractive to the students, faculty and staff, but to other residents. "If people feel there's more to do on Hillsborough [Street], then it will attract more people to businesses."

One business, Detour, is one of the businesses on Hillsborough that does not solely depend on their store for customers. Lisa, the manager of Detour, said, "My husband does a lot of shows and brings the store to the Brickyard. ... We also work at the State Fairgrounds."

Hillsborough Street and other businesses around the N.C. State campus feel the summer slump, but there's nothing the businesses can do but wait for the fall semester to begin and for the students to bring the business back to them.

Campus security guard division suffers cuts

◆ Officials remain optimistic despite the impending loss of a "supplemental patrol" on campus.

Sharolyn Banks
Staff Reporter

North Carolina's budget woes will soon put a strain on N.C. State's campus security forces.

In order to protect individuals in sworn positions, Campus Police will be forced to cut its supplementary security guard division. Twenty-six security guard positions will be terminated after June 27.

"The difficult part is that you are not letting people go because of poor performance but for the fact that we can't support them," said Sgt. Jon Barnswell.

The campus Human Resources Department started providing services to help those who were laid off find other positions at the university as well as in the state government. Barnswell said that some people have already found new positions.

The department is also feeling the effects of the budget cuts due to having two unfilled police officer positions.

Students will feel the effects when they have to wait longer for key requests. The individual departments on campus will now be responsible for making sure that doors are locked on time.

Barnswell says that the changes mean that the campus community will need to "take a more active role by serving as extra eyes and ears" to replace the supplemental patrol the security guard department once filled.

Though these changes seem disappointing, Barnswell said that campus "coverage will not be lost." The campus escort service will remain available, and there is interest from the various departments to allow a private security contractor to come in for lock-up purposes. Campus Police and the Raleigh Police Department are working to try to increase presence in the area on Hillsborough Street to make it more pedestrian friendly.

Barnswell says that even though the statewide crime rate is up by 1.5 percent, Raleigh's crime rate is down by 4 percent and campus crime is down by 11 percent. Campus statistics show that larceny is down by 25 percent, burglary by 28 percent and aggravated assault by 30 percent.

Barnswell said that "the security guards have done a fantastic job," but it is now time for the "campus community to stay aware of surroundings, report suspicious activity and use common sense (risk reduction), and we can all work together to keep our campus a safe place."

Officer Wingo and Campus Police will have to make changes because of the state's budget situation.

Professor elected president of teachers association

◆ N.C. State's Dr. John Penick will lead the National Science Teachers Association.

LaWanda Ray
Staff Reporter

Dr. John Penick, department head and professor of mathematics, science and technology education at N.C. State, has been elected as the new president of the National Science Teachers Association (NSTA).

The Virginia-based organization has over 53,000 members and is the world's largest professional science teacher organization.

Penick has been a member of the NSTA since 1970 and previously served as a board member, committee member and council member. He will begin his one-year term in June of 2003.

"The National Science Teachers Association is committed to ensuring that all students are science literate, since they are the key to tomorrow's skilled workforce, a strong economy, as well as our national security and general well-being," Penick said.

During his term as president, Penick will "provide direction for the organization; work with policy leaders to implement this direction and vision; [and] seek to influence those who have impact on science education, such as school leaders and administrators, scientists, the Congress [and] major governmental funding agencies such as the National Science Foundation and the Department of Education."

He will also try to influence universities to upgrade teacher education programs and state departments to ensure the teaching of science at all levels.

"With about 110 employees, NSTA produces journals for teachers of all levels," Penick said. "Science and Children" is for elementary science teachers, "Science Scope" is for middle-level teachers, "The Science Teacher" is for high school, and the "Journal of College Science Teaching" is the only journal devoted to teaching science at the college level.

There is also a bimonthly publication called NSTA Reports! This publication is in newspaper format, running 150 pages each issue, and provides current opportunities and resources for teachers.

"NSTA also has a publishing division with more than 200 titles and publishes 10 to 15 new books each year, and the NSTA Academy provides [this] service education for teachers all over the United States," Penick said.

"NSTA is a forum for communicating ideas about effective teaching and a place to learn of new resources, ways of teaching and how our students learn. NSTA has more than 2,000 college-level members — about 1,300 of which typically attend their annual conference," Penick said.

"I find it a very exciting place to be each year, and I would [like] them to come up to Philadelphia next March and join 14,000 educators, each seeking to be the best they can be, and 1,100 vendors, demonstrating the latest in science equipment, books and ideas."

KEEPIN' HOLLERIN' GOIN'

Contestants gathered in Spivey's Corner on Saturday to compete in the National Hollerin' Contest. The contest was started over 30 years ago in an attempt to keep the hollerin' tradition of Sampson County alive. Today the contest receives national media attention and is attended by several hundred people.

Technician will not run next Wednesday due to exams. Look for the next issue on July 3.

The summer movie season may turn out OK after all

Features Editor Joel Isaac Frady

I will issue one note before continuing in this article: In describing how well the movies over the past week were, I managed to avoid "Scooby-Doo" at all costs and have really no idea how that turned out. Then again, if you love the cartoon in the same way that I do, you probably don't want to know how it turned out. On the up side, the rest of the field has some very good films in it, and another good one that's just around the corner.

The Bourne Identity

Starring Matt Damon
Franka Potente
Directed by Doug Liman
★★★½

This thriller, based on the novel by Robert Ludlum, may follow the regular patterns that you'd expect a summer spy thriller to take, but unlike its recent counterpart (the horrendous "Bad Company"), it remembers to add style and fun to the mix.

It follows Jason Bourne (Damon) after his limp body is pulled out of the Mediterranean Sea, and he finds himself with no memory and two bullets in his back. He follows a few clues with the hopes of discovering who he is and finds that he has a few exceptional skills, like martial arts, as well as a case full of money at the bank.

Once the people he used to work for go after him (a team led by Chris Cooper and Brian Cox), he finds himself on the run with Marie (Potente, "Run Lola Run"), the "only person he knows."

Director Liman, who had previously directed the low-budget films "Swingers" and "Go," proves with "Identity" that he can hang out with the big boys, putting together a fluid, well-crafted, intense thriller. Damon was also on the line here — many people didn't think he'd be able to pull off this kind of role, but he too proves that he can be just as good a spy as anyone else and even better when it comes to a role like this. Other actors would fit the violent-assassin spy, but the actions that he's described as doing are juxtaposed to the tender, childlike Bourne he brings to the screen.

The supporting cast is also chosen perfectly, even though there is one matter of casting that's fairly questionable: Julia Stiles plays another agent in the field, but nothing is done with her character at all; she just calls in a few times with information on one of Bourne's targets. There's no romantic twist, really no twists at all, which begs the question, "Why cast Julia Stiles (or any other well-known talent) if you're not going to use that talent?" It's proper to cast an unfamiliar face, for here she just serves as a distraction. In theaters now.

Windtalkers

Starring Nicolas Cage
Adam Beach
Directed by John Woo

One thing's for sure: There hasn't been any shortage of war movies in the last year. We've seen "Behind Enemy Lines," "Black Hawk Down" and "We Were Soldiers" all in the last few months ... but if you like war movies, there's no complaining.

"Windtalkers" is a good film that tries to be great, an exercise in Woo's style that attempts to tell a deep story about war and humanity but can only manage a surface-level story about the attack on the island of Saipan.

This is the kind of film you'll want to see and not think about afterwards, for it's a very enjoyable two-plus-hour film. It's got a great cast, including Peter Stormare ("Fargo"), Noah Emmerich ("The Truman Show"), Mark Ruffalo ("You Can Count on Me") and Christian Slater, some great action sequences and a look that can't be beat. But if you think about it, the action sequences do seem a little glorified, and the cast isn't used to its full potential, filling in normal war-movie roles instead of the great characters we know they can play. There's also a lot of obvious product placement, with products like Lifesavers, Bacardi liquor and Hershey chocolate.

There's also the question raised as to whether John Woo, possibly the king of action, should really try to make a serious war movie — his talents seemed more appropriate in straight action films like "Face/Off."

But don't read the last two paragraphs! That was me telling my thoughts on this movie, and if you manage not to give it real thought, you'll find that it is a well-made, enjoyable war movie.

Wait ... it is good for a war movie to be "enjoyable." In theaters now.

Mr. Deeds

Starring Adam Sandler
Winona Ryder
Directed by Steven Brill

After "Little Nicky," it's understandable that a lot of people are cautious about new Adam Sandler movies — it did use a different type of humor than the rest of his films. While some of us found it hysterical, the average person was begging for more of the goofy, kind-hearted Sandler he or she loves so much.

For people just wanting this or people just wanting a funny comedy, you really can't go wrong with "Mr. Deeds."

It's very much back to his roots, with this film playing on the same levels as "Big Daddy" and "Happy Gilmore," and we even get the random outbursts of violence in Longfellow Deeds that made the Gilmore character so funny.

The movie is based on the 1936 Gary Cooper film "Mr. Deeds goes to Town," even though the two films probably don't have that much in common. Sandler plays Deeds, a pizza-store owner in a small town who dreams of writing cards for Hallmark. In an unexpected turn, some big-city types visit him and tell him that his long-lost uncle just died ... and that he's inherited $40 billion, which is $39 billion more than those big-city guys want to let him keep.

News reporter Pam Dawson (Ryder) is also spying on him, having convinced him that she's a sweet school nurse to grab his attention and catch some embarrassing footage of him. This leads to one of the film's best scenes, as Deeds goes out on the town causing havoc with a particular celebrity.

Sandler also has another good supporting cast to back him up as well, as Peter Gallagher takes a break from serious roles to have fun as the villain, Ryder plays the perfect leading lady, and John Turturro grabs nonstop laughs as Sandler's sneaky butler. In theaters! June 28.

Enon hits the high notes

Enon
High Society

Staff Writer Ghassan Hamra

It's not often that a band goes from a more experimental style to a more pop-driven style. Once a band goes experimental, it's hard to imagine them doing anything but experimenting. However, a few bands have decided to take steps back into more pop-friendly styles lately. Sonic Youth's newest album is an example of this, as is Enon's newest album, "High Society."

Enon is made up of a laundry list of different bands with very different styles. John Schmersal is the driving force of the band and spent the former half of his music career as a member of the less-than-accessible Brainiac, before singer Tim Taylor was killed in a car accident. Rick Lee can be heard in past work from Skeleton Key, while bassist/vocalist Toko Yasuda spent much of her earlier music career in Blonde Redhead and The Lapse.

Combining all these different bands into one would usually be fraught with apprehension, but luckily for us, the members have pooled their idiosyncrasies and ideas into a more-than-successful group. The band has been touring consistently since their conception, sharing the stage with bands like the Dismemberment Plan, The Album Leaf and The Convocation Of ... Enon's live show is often more than an experience, with Schmersal often wandering into the crowd to rile up the audience with tactics like serenading audience members or licking their faces.

2000's "Believo" was the band's first effort together, and it was more than successful. Unlike "High Society,"

"Believo" showed equal parts experimental music, clearly the influence of Schmersal's work with Brainiac, and pop music. With their newest album, Enon throws out their voice effects pedal in favor of vocals from both Schmersal and Yasuda — an intelligent move, as Yasuda's vocals were the saving grace for The Lapse at many times. Yasuda's style can be seen as a more upbeat Yoko Ono, if you added talent. Schmersal's vocals also stray from their more scatterbrained fusion of every style imaginable for a more consistent pop/jazz style.

The album is consistent with its pop sound until you hit track five, "Native Numb," where Schmersal's voice pedal makes a cameo to throw you off track for a just a moment before "Leave it to Rust" puts you back on the main road of pop adventure. This is what can be expected from the rest of the album, until you reach the title track, which exhibits a whining violin that can only be thought of in association with an avant garde bar scene, perhaps — somewhere in New York — Thurston Moore and Björk are downing Absinthe.

Of course, this is all hypothetical and nonsensical. Though it doesn't hold a candle to Enon's live show, "High Society" is an outstanding album, worth every penny it costs to own and worth every second it takes to listen to it, over and over again.

A new era is coming in video games. Remember how no one in your area really appreciated all the cool strategies you developed to trounce people in "Perfect Dark"? Xbox, Microsoft has created the most ambitious online plan of the three companies with its Xbox Live service. The service is used by every online Xbox game in connecting players to the Internet.

When Xbox Live launches this fall, gamers will have to purchase $50 starter kits to get ... uh, started. You will need to already have some kind of Internet service beforehand. Each starter kit will include an Xbox voice communicator (a headset microphone for voice chat, as well as an Xbox Live software disc to initialize your online account. Once you insert the disc, you will choose a permanent user ID and construct a password by pressing buttons on the Xbox controller. Credit-card data must be entered for billing purposes, but Microsoft is promising "military grade" security to ensure your safety. The kit also allows you to use Xbox Live for one year, and the cost of the service after this initial period hasn't been announced. An online version of "Revol" will be included for those that can't afford an online game yet.

The Xbox Live service comes with plenty of perks. The voice communicator will play a big role, as every online game will include voice chat capabilities. Two matching programs will be available: Opti-Match, which matches you with players of your skill level and a net connection comparable to yours, and Quick Match, which brings up the first server with an opening. An instant messenger service lets you keep track of your buddies when they come online and invite them to play with you. Finally, the cool "voice-masking" feature allows you to distort your voice to sound like a robot, little girl or whatever suits your fancy.

You won't have to worry about any shortage of online games when you buy your starter kit, either. Some of the games that will be available when Xbox Live launches include "Unreal Championship," "Phantasy Star Online," "MechAssault," "Counter Strike," "NFL or NBA 2K3," "Toe Jam & Earl III" and "Timesplitters 2." As if these weren't enough, online versions of "Halo," "Amped," "Project Gotham Racing" and "Rallispport Challenge" are also planned.

The main problem with the Xbox Live service is that players must have a broadband connection to go online. Sure, this isn't a problem when you're sitting in your dorm room with N.C. State's nice Ethernet connection, but chances are that you have dial-up connection at home, which the Xbox doesn't support. Broadband connections are also prohibitively expensive, averaging around $50 a month. If you can take the plunge, Xbox Live offers up some of the best online gaming around.

Playstation 2. Not one to be a spectator, Sony has crafted an online plan of its own. However, instead of an ubiquitous service like Microsoft's, Sony will essentially just release the necessary hardware for players to get online and leave it up to developers to set up their own servers and billing plans.

This August, the Playstation 2 Network adapter will hit stores for around $40. The adapter has both a dial-up port and an Ethernet port, so you won't have to buy separate adapters for playing at school and at home. Included with the adapter will be a start-up disc that lets players configure their Playstation 2s for their ISP (Internet Service Provider). If you don't have an ISP, you can sign up for one by using the subscription offers included on the disc. Finally, you choose your online ID and a password, and you're ready to go. An online version of "Frequency" is included on the start-up disc.

The Playstation 2 will enjoy a number of online games of its own to compete with the Xbox. "SOCOM: Navy Seals" will include a headset microphone for voice chat during online play. Other online games include "Tony Hawk's Pro Skater 4," "Tribes: Aerial Assault," "Twisted Metal: Black Online," "Timesplitters 2" and "AutoModellista." Next year will see the release of the much-anticipated "Final Fantasy XI" and a version of the PC hit "Everquest." "Final Fantasy XI" will require usage of the Playstation 2 hardware, which will be released some time next year.

Gamecube. If you're looking to take your Gamecube online, you could be waiting a while. Nintendo's online plan is easily the weakest of the three, but Nintendo has a few incentives to get the ball rolling. The broadband and dial-up adapters will be released this fall for $35 each, but only one game will be available to use them: "Phantasy Star Online." It's not known yet whether or not some kind of special offer will include the adapters with the game.

Nintendo says that it has some online games of its own in development, but the company will not release them until "the market is ready." (Read: They can turn a profit from them.) However, Nintendo assures gamers that it won't charge fees to play its online games. That's pretty much all that's known.

So, there you have it. None of the online plans are really ideal, but you still have a few choices. If you can afford it, the Xbox's ambitious set-up could deliver big time. The Playstation 2's online service is pretty promising, but its ad hoc system can be complicated. If you don't care about online gaming, then you won't have any complaints about the Gamecube's almost non-existent plans. Look for more information to trickle out about all three systems this fall as the launch dates near.

Saturday, June 15, 12:01 p.m.: Man, I was pretty out of it when I listened to this new Sonic Youth last night, but I remember it was pretty good. I think I hope Kim Gordon doesn't sing on it, her voice is so completely horrible.

Track One: Wow, this track is pretty good. Reminds me of some of their earlier work around the "Daydream Nation" era, but less layered and much more minimal. Phew — so far, so good. Maybe it will finally make up for the pile of human waste that was "NYC Ghosts and Flowers."

Track Two: I can't believe I'm actually enjoying this. After I saw them for the first time at the Ritz, I thought I was going to cry for having spent $18 on a ticket. It's a good thing this is nothing like that. With Jim O'Rourke on board, I think they might get onto the right track. This is pretty surprising, considering O'Rourke usually encourages more experimental work from the groups he works with, such as with Wilco's "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot." Either way, nothing to complain about so far.

Track Three: Uh-hh, when did Tom Verlaine (from New York's Television) join the band? I know Thurston Moore himself described this particular track as being reminiscent of TV, but this is a bit much. I guess I can't complain; overall, this track is even better than the first two, though not by much.

Track Four: I wonder how much tickets are to the show they're having at the Ritz in August... $18 again! Who do these guys think they are, Radiohead? I'll see if I can scam a free ticket from the record company. This track is pretty good — nothing special, nothing horrible.

(Four-and-a-half minutes into the track ...) I guess this extraneous feedback means the track is almost up. (Five-and-a-half minutes into the track ...) Yeah, guitars are cooling off, here comes the end. (Six-and-a-half minutes into the track ...) Oh uh, they've gone pretentious rock on me and not in a good, Tortoise kind of way. Come on guys! Thurston, Lee — just stop yourselves now and everything will be forgiven. (Eight-and-a-half minutes into the track ...) Flushes toilet. Man, is this thing still going? (Ten-and-a-half minutes into the track ...) Well, there goes five minutes of my life that I could have used for watching SNL reruns.

Track Five: "Radical Adults Lick Godhead Style" — What the hell kind of track title is that? Oh no, here comes the ridiculous feedback garbage that made me dislike Sonic Youth in the first place. Well, that was only about 20 seconds, not too bad, and the track has gotten bet— oh man, there it goes again!

Track Six: Kim, Kim, Kim. Why did you have to chime in? You did a good job of keeping your mouth shut until now. What are those lyrics? "I hate this, I hate that, I'm tired of this, I'm tired of that, blah blah blah." Uch, things were going pretty d— good until now. Thank you Kim for treating us to a helping of the monotone, angst-ridden bastion of poop that is your voice.

Track Seven: D— it Kim, not again! Well, the album is lost at this point anyway.

The Aftermath: This wasn't too bad. The first half of the album was great. In fact, if they had stopped halfway through track four, they would have had a solid EP.

Too bad. This album will be out June 25, and Sonic Youth will be at the Ritz on August 7. You probably won't see me there.

University shames those not graduating on time

GEORGIA PLANS TO REVOKE PRIVILEGES FROM STUDENTS GRADUATING IN MORE THAN FOUR YEARS.

To combat an abundance of students graduating in more than four years, the University of Georgia announced a plan to remove privileges and embarrass these students. The university's proposal includes referring to students by the number of years in which they have attended school, for example "fifth-year" or "seventh-year" students, in attempts to embarrass them and placing these students behind freshmen in priority lists for campus parking and athletic tickets.

This decision, meant to lessen university overcrowding, overlooks the fact that many students work, participate in co-op programs, study abroad for a time period or even double major. UGA's proposal attempts to address a real problem, but their method is an attack on the very students who have been paying tuition and supporting the school for the longest amount of time.

The national average for college students to receive a degree is 5.3 years, but at UGA, this number is only 4.3 years. Yet university officials are still concerned because students average 13 class hours a semester. CNN quoted UGA Provost Karen Holbrook after asking, "What are [students] doing with their time?" Holbrook stated, "Certainly many of them work and are involved in extracurricular activities. But we think with the caliber of our students, they can take a much better program and do very well at it."

These comments ignore the fact that many students have jobs to pay for school, including positions working on campus and/or participating in co-op or internship programs. What a student does with his/her time is a very personal issue, and as long as students pay tuition on schedule and take a class load above the minimum limit, the university should not make an across-the-board punishment for students in school more than four years.

Many students have valid reasons to take longer than four years to graduate, including personal health reasons. Giving freshmen parking permit and athletic ticket priority over upper-class students is an absurd way to promote graduating in four years. In addition, schools often encourage students to seek diverse degree programs, including taking classes outside one's major. Georgia's new plan would cause many students to neglect classes outside of their major and therefore limit students' opportunities to broaden their education.

If the university feels that overcrowding is a serious problem, then the admissions department must analyze their acceptance patterns and consider the average graduation rate at UGA. Another option would be to enforce stricter rules on upholding student status, such as making students maintain higher GPAs and codes of conduct. Punishing students for graduating in more than four years would essentially reward students who do not double major, intern, co-op, study abroad or participate in university programs which consume large amounts of time, such as athletics or on-campus jobs.

Construction began this week on what will eventually be a 217-mile fence that partially separates Israel from the West Bank and, Israeli officials hope, from Palestinian suicide bombers. The Chinese and German governments both sent diplomatic missives to Israel's leaders, explaining that such wall-building projects almost never turn out as planned in the long run.

Lawmakers support ousting Hussein

Responding to reports that President Bush recently authorized the CIA to use whatever means necessary to topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, several members of Congress voiced support earlier this week for such an effort. Alabama Senator Richard Shelby said, with a sparkle in his eye, "First the Taliban, now Hussein. We're thinking France next. You cannot stop the beast!"

North Carolina leads census challenges

Almost 10 percent of the challenges to the 2000 census have come from North Carolina, a federal official said in an interview recently. The resolved challenges have so far netted the state 166 citizens, mostly old women who, according to their nearest neighbors, "stay down yonder, with all their cats."

Judge orders S.C. to accept plutonium

A judge has ordered South Carolina to allow federal shipments of weapons-grade plutonium into the state. A Department of Energy spokesman recently berated the state and its leadership for ordering shipments halted, saying, "It's only six-and-a-half tons of plutonium. What's the problem, [Governor Jim] Hodges?" Crickets chirped in the awkward silence that followed.

Supreme Court rejects permit

The Supreme Court on Monday struck down an Ohio town's ordinance requiring door-to-door salesmen or missionaries to obtain a permit before conducting their visits. The high court ruled that the law violated the First Amendment and that it would hurt the university of Jehovah's Witnesses and door-to-door salesmen jobs, creating a generation of humorless Ohioans.

Guantanamo population grows

The number of Taliban and al Qaeda detainees being held by the U.S. military at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, continues to grow weekly, standing now at about 536, according to military officials. After reporting the population, one officer said, "You know, we don't have to charge them with anything. We could just keep them indefinitely." From somewhere, a rim shot sounded.

Britney boooo

A power failure at a Britney Spears concert in Lubbock, Texas, on Friday night resulted in a canceled show and unhappy, booing fans. After just two songs, a transformer blew at the United Spirit Arena, disabling the whiz-bang special effects used to distract audiences from the awful, mindless music.

Mass walkout at Afghan loya jirga

More than half of the delegates of Afghanistan's loya jirga, the meeting intended to produce a working government for the country, left the conference this week with a variety of complaints. Some alleged that the interim government used delay and coercion tactics to its own advantage, and others were just sick of President Hamid Karzai's funny hats.

Martha Stewart was recently accused of insider trading. However, with a banana, a domino, a light bulb, and a rubber band, she beat a lie detector test.

When you buy drugs, you support terrorism?

Decker Ngongang

STAFF COLUMNIST

Never have I been more confused by a commercial, except maybe when I first saw the "Truth" commercials about smoking.

Are they so desperate to stop our young people and everyone else from getting high that they've resorted to the whole six degrees of separation approach?

I don't buy it, even though I don't use drugs. I think this was a horrible attempt to use a crisis situation to advertise the war on drugs.

My mother used to do the same thing whenever I did anything bad. "Decker, when you don't clean your room, you make way for bugs to come in your room while you are sleeping." Now I understand that cleaning my room was important, but socks and jeans on the floor aren't going to invite bugs into my room. If they are going to come, they are going to come, clean room or not. A dirty room just made the trek a little easier for the bugs. Just like the analogy above, drugs and the money involved don't necessarily invite terrorist into our country; they just make the trip a little easier. Yes, I am sure the elimination of the drug trade would put a lot of these terrorists out of business, but hell, it would also have weird effects on our economy. Many teenagers and adults wipe these commercials off with a glance and a chuckle just like I did when my mom told me to clean my room for the above reasons. If you want me to clean my room, just explain why, and I will make my own decision — sink or swim. Don't cloud it with the latest tragedy and try to make me feel guilty when current news headlines lead me to believe that our own government knew something about terrorist happenings even before they happened. Isn't that support? This is interesting: I think I will take a minute to ponder this with my pen. They tell me buying drugs supports terrorism and subsequent terrorism, a fact that I won't attempt to deny. The problem I have is these commercials rob themselves of credibility with lots of people when they fail to list the government among the list of offenders of terrorism and the supporters of the drug trade. I am not accusing the government of helping buy up the World Trade Center towers, but I do think they knew more than they hint at and thus are indirectly responsible for a lot of the ill-prepared people that died trying to save lives.

As the news has detailed, the government, through the FBI, CIA and NSA, was horribly inefficient in analyzing obvious clues of terror threats to the United States. In what can be called egotistic zeal, these three levels of national security withheld information from each other, further placing our lives in jeopardy. This is support for terrorism.

If these government agencies have such poor communication on the welfare of all Americans, this can do nothing but help those who intend to hurt us all. I am confused when I see the commercials telling me that buying drugs pays for terrorism. Don't patronize me — we all know terrorists have money. True, some are drug-supported but not all; in this instance, a legitimate oil inheritance supported these events. In the recent case, government officials' incompetence and the far-reaching bureaucracy paid for terrorism, not financially, but in making it easier for these events to happen. Don't blame the kid buying the bag of weed by implying that he is responsible for our country's plight. Instead, explain why people shouldn't use them and be done with it. Tactics seen in these commercials only confuse and reduce credibility for a government struggling with that very thing.

I know my columns mean little in the grand scheme of things, but it is important to me. When you insult people by accusing them of something so far out of conception, you do nothing but create disbelief and leave yourself open to hypocrisy. The government has good points as to how terrorism is supported but should not use a national tragedy to blame people, primarily young people, for something it knew was going to happen.

Decker thinks that dirty rooms encourage terrorists to hide under your bed. E-mail him with any sightings at dmgonga@university.ncsu.edu.

Girl gone wild

As most people have heard by now, wildfires are already rampaging in the western United States.

About 176,000 acres have burned so far, more than had burned by this time in 2000, which was a benchmark year for bad fires. Arizona, Colorado and California are a few of the states affected thus far.

Unbelievably, a forestry technician, who worked with the U.S. Forest Service, started one of the most disastrous fires of this year. This is unbelievable because she was patrolling the area in order to enforce a fire ban, and because she built the fire to burn a letter from her estranged husband.

Terry Barton was responsible for a fire that scorched more than 100,000 acres of Pike National Park in Denver, Colo. The fire destroyed 22 homes and caused the evacuation of 5,400 people from their homes as it burned within 40 miles of Denver city limits, threatening the suburbs. The fire had begun on June 8, reported by Barton to authorities. Instead of telling the truth, she told them she had found an illegal fire and attempted to put it out by throwing dirt on it, but it was too late to suppress it.

An investigation ensued, one that uncovered the truth. Barton is charged with setting fire to timber in the national forest, damaging federal property in excess of $100,000 and making false statements to investigators. If convicted, she could face 10 years in prison and fines up to $250,000.

By this past Sunday, 35 percent of the blaze had been controlled, and the sheriff's deputies were escorting people back into the threatened areas in which they lived to get belongings and check for damages, but they were not allowed to stay.

The Pike National Park fire is one of seven in the state of Colorado. Around 667 homes were evacuated in the midst of only two of the fires, and in one of the other fire areas, residents in more than 400 more homes were advised to be ready to evacuate also.

With the drought season, it is very difficult for the firefighters to control the fires that have erupted. Some days that are more humid and have calmer winds help them in their efforts, but those days are few and far between. One thing I find astounding is that even though Barton built the fire in an designated cigarette bin, she should have known better than to do so, especially while she was enforcing a fire ban. What makes it even more preposterous is that she built it in order to burn an ex-husband's letter. How much less effort would it have been to merely throw the letter away? Maybe she afraid that it would blow out of the trash and come after her to torment her.

There is no excuse for what she did, and even though forest fires are beneficial, they are so only when they are natural and in moderation. The punishment should fit the crime, so she should be forced to see her ex-husband and, if she cares about the forests, should be made to watch them burn. All that and the jail sentence, during which she could be put to work helping people rebuild their burnt-down homes.

The city of Raleigh has asked citizens to conserve water because the water supply is 13 percent lower than needed. E-mail Holly Bezent at paz_rata@yahoo.com.

Grundy plays waiting game

◆ Next Wednesday there will be plenty of nervous players, including Anthony Grundy, hoping their names are called in the NBA Draft.

Matt Middleton

Assistant Sports Editor

Quick, name the last N.C. State basketball player to be taken in the NBA Draft? Kenny Inge? Kevin Thompson? C.C. Harrison? Tom Gugliotta?

Actually, the correct answer would be Todd Fuller, who was drafted with the 11th overall pick by the Golden State Warriors in 1996. The Wolfpack hasn't had a player drafted since Fuller — a span of 6 years, representing the longest such drought in the program's history.

Prior to the 2001-02 season, Todd Fuller was the last State player to garner first-team All-ACC honors.

Of course Anthony Grundy ended that streak for the Pack by exploding for a remarkable senior season that earned him a spot on the All-ACC first-team. Grundy will once again try to match Fuller and end the Pack's futile search by putting his name in the NBA Draft, which is scheduled for June 26 at Madison Square Garden in New York.

Grundy was also named an honorable mention All-American. He became the first player in school history to amass at least 1,500 points, 500 rebounds, 300 assists and 200 steals.

Developing a jump shot that was a legitimate weapon was the biggest reason for Grundy's senior success. Teaming that with the ability to penetrate and assume the role of the defensive stopper, Grundy becomes an intriguing prospect that some scouts believe can play point or off guard.

At a wiry 6 feet, 3 inches, with Scottie Pippen-like arms, Grundy probably falls into the former category, which means teams must believe he can adequately handle the ball in order to play point guard.

Grundy began his quest to prove that and hopefully shoot up the draft charts by taking part in the NBA Pre-Draft Camp in Chicago June 5-7.

"The biggest difference is the intensity level, so it's just a matter of staying in shape and going there ready to play," said Grundy prior to the camp.

With 63 players from colleges across the country fighting for their professional dreams, the intensity level was probably off the charts.

Playing on a team with college stars like Iowa's Luke Recker, Cincinnati's Steve Logan and UCLA's Matt Barnes, Grundy scored 16 points in three games.

Prior to attending the camp, Grundy spent the off-season on his own training program that focused on shooting and intense running sessions.

"I've been kind of on my own training plan, working out with the team, shooting and just staying in shape by doing a lot of cardiovascular," said Grundy.

With the talent pool as deep as ever, there's no guarantee Grundy will be taken in the two-round affair that often leaves athletes crushed and dreams shattered.

The recent influx of European and foreign-born talents has only depleted the number of college stars who fulfill their goal of playing in the league.

Players taken in the first round receive a three-year contract with an additional year at the option of the team. Players chosen in the second round are not guaranteed contracts.

If a player goes undrafted, he can still be signed by teams to participate in training camps and possibly land a spot on the roster.

tossing in one point and three rebounds.

Lewis saw action in only one game this week for the Comets, a 51-50 victory over the Minnesota Lynx on Saturday. Lewis scored two points in 16 minutes, while dishing out four assists.

Football season ticket sales continue at a record pace

It's really not a question of whether N.C. State will sell out all of its home football games this fall, but rather a question of when it will happen. With ticket orders coming in at a furious pace, the Wolfpack is on the verge of selling out Carter-Finley Stadium for the second straight year.

The Pack will play seven home games this season, starting with the Black Coaches Association Bowl against New Mexico on Saturday, Aug. 24.

With 29,242 season tickets already sold as of Monday, State is rapidly approaching last year's record of 30,500, which eclipsed the previous mark by approximately 6,000 season tickets.

Because of decreased requests from visiting teams, athletic department officials project that the school will be able to sell up to 31,500 season tickets for this season. The remaining season tickets are expected to be scooped up within the next several weeks. Once that happens, game-day sales will be limited to a select few games on the home schedule.

Handicapping the NBA lottery

Next week at this time, when the only worthwhile sporting event coming on before 2

a.m. is baseball, we can all break the annual June-July sports boredom by watching teenagers collect their millions of dollars while showing off a fancy suit or two.

This year, however, the field of the NBA Draft gets slightly older, as only one high-school player (Amare Stoudamire) has a realistic chance of being taken in the lottery.

While trying to handicap the lottery can be about as difficult as obtaining an interview with Mike Krzyzewski, here's a shot.

1. Yao Ming, center, Shanghai Sharks. Without a true presence in the post and already having a relatively stable backcourt in Cuttino Mobley and Steve Francis, the winner of the draft lottery for Houston is almost certain to draft the 7-foot-6-inch Chinese big man if negotiations between the two parties go well this week.

Ming can become the heir apparent to Houston legend Hakeem Olajuwon, who bolted for Toronto last season instead of finishing his career with the city he had played his entire professional and college career in.

The obvious con here is that the Rockets would be passing over the ultra-talented Jay "Don't call me Jaly'son" Williams, certainly something that they could come to regret in a Sam Bowie sort of way. But drafting a point guard in this position isn't a message they want to send to their franchise player and point guard Francis, who is fitting in nicely when healthy.

The wild card here is Williams' teammate at Duke, Mike Dunleavy Jr. It would not be unreasonable to deduce that Dunleavy is the most talented player in the draft, but the Rockets simply cannot overlook the fact that Kelvin Cato is their strongest inside player. Enough said.

After taking Ming, the Rockets could start the most youthfully talented five in the league with a starting line-up of Francis, Mobley, Kenny Thomas, Eddie Griffin and Ming.

2. Jay Williams, guard, Duke. The Chicago Bulls would be absolutely tickled to see Williams available at their pick in the No. 2 position.

Since last year's draft was a collection of extremely young and raw players, the Bulls were forced to draft a pair of high schoolers that will need time and a superstar guard to help them succeed. Williams is probably the only player in the draft ready to step in and challenge for a spot on the all-star team immediately.

With the status quo in Chicago being nothing short of abysmal, Williams is a franchise player willing to take the reins of a team that is probably at least two seasons away from legitimately challenging for a playoff berth, even in the weak Eastern Conference.

3. Mike Dunleavy Jr., guard/forward, Duke. Yes, Duke will have two players drafted in the first three picks. Yes, Dunleavy and Williams were probably the best two players in the country last year. Yes, they still found a way to lose in the Sweet 16.

Dunleavy, for now at least, has given up his senior season and decided to test the waters of the draft instead of probably enjoying a year that would have been filled with countless awards and accolades.

Gone are the days of the Tim Hardaway-Chris Mullin backcourt in Oakland, and vanishing with the former Golden State stars were the wins. Draft-day flops became the norm in the Bay Area with players like Adonal Foyle, Todd Fuller and Joe Smith incapable of taking the Warriors back to respectability.

With the Warriors' drafting skills akin to that of Mark Madsen dancing, picking Dunleavy would assure them of getting the superstar they so desperately need.

Moreover, the Warriors are in a prime spot where even they can't pick a bad player. With needs at point guard and center — even if Dunleavy is unavailable, Ming will have the option of picking Ming or Williams.

That is, of course, hinging on the fact Dunleavy doesn't return to Duke for his senior season. He has until June 19 to make that choice.

4. DaJuan Wagner, guard, Memphis. The comparisons to Iverson are off-base at this point in the career of Mill Wagner's son. He didn't even lead his team to the NCAA tournament and often forced shot after shot from his point guard position.

Nevertheless, his raw talent cannot be overlooked, and after the Grizzlies shipped out Mike Bibby in favor of the other Jason Williams, a long-term point guard is certainly what the Grizzlies need.

With new general manager Jerry West in place, look for the Grizzlies to make some draft-day moves that could bring either one of the top three picks to the city of blues and barbecue.

Memphis has on the trading block both Stromile Swift and Lorenzen Wright — either player could be used to lure Houston into swapping picks.

5. Caron Butler, guard, Connecticut. Perhaps no one in the NBA needs a superstar guard more than the Denver Nuggets. With that in mind, Butler should get the nod over Drew Gooden and Chris Wilcox, both of whom are good NBA talents; they just don't meet Denver's need, considering the Nuggets already have two high-priced power forwards — Juwon Howard and Antonio McDyeess.

The 6-foot-7-inch Butler, a small forward in college, is capable of playing the two-guard in the league where big guards like Kobe Bryant and Tracy McGrady are the hot commodity. He's explosive off the dribble, has a reliable jump shot and needs to add bulk.

After trading away Nick Van Exel and starting games with a backcourt of James Posey and Voshon Lenard, the Nuggets' primary need is a backcourt player of any kind. If Butler is unavailable here, look for them to take Wagner.

Mastroeni and United States march to quarterfinals

U.S. National Team coach Bruce Arena inserted former Wolfpack soccer standout Pablo Mastroeni back into the starting lineup Monday against Mexico, and the move helped land the U.S. into the quarterfinals of the World Cup for the first time since 1930.

Mastroeni, who played at N.C. State from 1994-97, played 89 minutes in the 2-0 U.S. victory, his first action since the first game of the tournament, which saw the U.S. down world-power Portugal.

Landon Donovan and Brian McBride scored goals for the U.S., which next faces Germany.

The U.S. is now 2-0 in games that Mastroeni has seen action.

Wolfpack WNBA roundup

N.C. State's four WNBA representatives continued their play in this week with a bevy of action around the league. Cleveland's Chastity Melvin and Charlotte's Andrea Stinson led the way with two double-digit scoring efforts.

Melvin's squad began the week on Tuesday with a 74-65 loss to the Miami Sol. Melvin, who has started every game for the Rockers, played 34 minutes and scored 10 points on four-of-five shooting from the field, while grabbing six rebounds.

In Friday's 69-63 loss to the Washington Mystics, Melvin struggled from the floor but snared a season-high eight rebounds to go with five points and two assists in 32 minutes.

In her final game of the week (Saturday's 79-68 victory over the Indiana Fever), Melvin played a season-low 27 minutes but made good use of her time. The crafty center scored 10 points on three-of-six shooting and dished out a season-best four assists.

Stinson's Sting began the week against Tynesha Lewis' Houston Comets on Tuesday and were defeated 78-66. Stinson started the game and played 32 minutes, scoring 13 points. She also had an excellent floor game with seven rebounds and four assists. Former Wolfpack All-American Summer Erb also played seven minutes in the game.

In Thursday's 75-64 victory over Indiana, Stinson scored 15 points on 7-12 shooting, while grabbing three rebounds, two assists and two steals. Erb chipped in an efficient 11 points in 13 minutes on a perfect four-of-four shooting from the floor.

Stinson played 33 minutes in a one-point loss (54-53) to the New York Liberty on Saturday, scoring eight points and grabbing a season-high 11 rebounds. Erb played eight minutes in the game,
